Psychology Major Using Degree to Save Endangered Species

After earning a degree in zoo animal technology, Steve Fosselman was working with African primates at the Fort Wayne Children's Zoo. Though he loved the job, Fosselman also realized he could accomplish more to protect animals if he came to Purdue University Fort Wayne to study—if you can believe it—psychology.

"I felt like I wasn't making the impact I could," Fosselman said. "With every keeper talk (presentation) and encounter at the zoo, I poured my heart out trying to connect with each guest. I realized, although important, the people I needed to connect with were those that called that land their home. That is where the discipline of social psychology comes into play."

Fosselman, B.A. '22, has a unique interpretation of conservation. Instead of telling people bluntly to stop harvesting natural resources and driving animals into extinction, what if other suggestions could support the planet better?

Mastodon Memories

This summer series explores the campus experiences of current PFW faculty and staff who are also alumni.

Daniel Patten, B.A. Psychology ’09; B.A. Sociology ’10

Assistant professor of criminal justice in the Department of Criminal Justice and Public Administration

Despite having a varied professional background that includes stints in Virginia, Michigan, and Texas, Daniel Patten wanted to come home to be closer to family and friends, and returned to PFW two years ago to teach criminal justice.
